History of The Maintenance of Indigenous Languages and Records (MILR) Program

- 1973 – The Australian Government supported Indigenous languages through the Education portfolio.
 - School Languages Other Than English (LOTE) program is still funded by Education department.
- 1991 – Reviews established Indigenous languages program administered through Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Commission (ATSIC).
 - This program had two parts:
 - the Maintenance of Indigenous Languages; and
 - Endangered Languages (those with fewer than 20 fluent speakers).

MILR addresses the erosion and loss of Australia's Indigenous languages by providing funding for their maintenance, revival and transmission

- MILR objectives are:
 - support the maintenance of Indigenous languages (Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander languages only);
 - increase the use of Indigenous languages in a range of fields and media, including greater Indigenous community engagement;
 - increase public appreciation of Indigenous languages; and
 - support organisations working to support Indigenous languages by ensuring these organisations develop sustainably.

MILR underpins the National Indigenous Languages Policy

- The National Indigenous Languages Policy was announced in 2009 and confirms the Government's commitment to keep Indigenous languages alive and help Indigenous Australians connect with their language and culture.
- Organisations can apply for MILR funding through the annual competitive funding round. Details are located on www.arts.gov.au
- The full list of MILR projects being funded in 2011-12 can be accessed from www.arts.gov.au/indigenous/indigenous_funding_2011-12
